TO DRAIN UTAH LAKE,

J. B. Taylor Believes the Scheme is Feasible and Practical.

J. B. Taylor's attention was first called to the problem of utilizing the waters of Barville, Ind.; Marysville, Ks.; Utah lake in August, 1886. He found that, measuring by the Liverpool standard, the evaporation is thirty-six inches a year. His idea was to reduce the area of the lake. Louis, Mo., and Milwaukee, Wis. to the problem of utilizing the waters of from its present area of 80,000 square acres to about 25,000 acres. There is a fall between the Jordan at Utah iake and the first dam of about eight or nine feet. To dredge the river from the first dam to give the river its normal flow, reducing take surface eight feet, would reclaim 55.000 acres of land, leaving a body of water still in the lake covering 25,000 acres. This, he says, would protect all the water rights in the Jordan river and by the reduced evaporation Jordan river and by the reduced evaporation would give water enough to reciain the 250,000 acres of land lying between Utah lake and the Great Salt lake. This would open for settlement the 55,000 acres of ground now under Utah lake, which is all sub-irrigated, and will produce crops without irrigation.
